For the millions of Sammys

366 days before

Everyone is crying but me. Seven days since she passed. Seven days, eleven hours, forty-three minutes and sixteen seconds. Counting the days, hours, minutes, to stop myself from drowning.

Everyone is crying but me.
Dad squeezes my shoulder.
Be brave, Nat.
I walk towards the front of the church.
Seven days, eleven hours, fifty-three minutes and nine, ten, eleven, twelve . . .

Everyone is crying but me.

I'm trying to remember how to breathe,
my desert-dry mouth,
hands trembling,
I swallow sand.

It feels like an eternity before I find my voice.

Everyone is crying but me.

Tears stream down Dad's face —
he's given up wiping them away.
His voice c r a c k s as he reminds everyone of who she was.

Katherine. Kate . . . Kitty . . .
her laugh joy for life mermaid wonderful mother beautiful wife . . .
activist big heart . . .

my mum.

Everyone is crying. Everyone, even me.

Me and Mama have lain here on the cold floor for hours or seconds.

It's hard to know anything right now.

I lie next to Baba, his warm hands turned cold.

I want more than anything to breathe life back into him.

Baba was fearless in a country ruled by fear. I wish I was like you, I would say. My son the stargazer, he would say. You are perfect just as you are.

Mama moves in waves, her body undulating, a crash of howls.

I am a rock.
Unresponsive
to her swells of emotion,
as she beats her chest and folds into half the woman she was.

His blood seeps into my shirt, staining my skin.

I breathe into the holes in his chest.

Our salty tears mix with his iron blood, which soaks into our skin, our hair, our guilt, that we live and he doesn't.

Mama looks at me. In this moment she is still and serious.

I can't hide you forever, Samuel. It is time.

They will come for you next.

336 days before

I should have taken more videos of her. I should have recorded every moment, caught every breath, savoured every laugh.

I touch the screen, wanting to grab hold of her – to reach through my phone and pull her out.

I wish she was still here, Dad.

I know, love, I know.

Dad's desperate to keep it together, but he's broken, we all are.

We've kept our distance these past few months, keeping our sharp edges to ourselves.

Getting too close could cause a puncture and then we'll see it. The emptiness. The grief. It'll leak out, or pull us in. Either way, there'll be no escaping it.

My heart shifts a little, knowing we'll never be the same.

Knowing we won't ever fit like before.

Mum was like winter socks. She knew how to keep you warm. She knew how to hold you.

Dad's like fingerless gloves. He tries, but he doesn't quite reach your edges – the important bits – the bits that really matter.

'Watch this, Nat! Watch me!'
We stare at the screen as Mum cartwheels straight into the sea and then emerges, coughing and laughing, trying to catch her breath.

That laugh, Ryan says, smiling, and he's right.

Mum was small, but she was a powerhouse. Big laugh. Big smile. Big heart.

Ryan slides his finger across the screen so we can watch the scene play out again and again and again.

She was so passionate, wasn't she, Dad? Like about everything.

She was, Nat, he says. She cared too much, your mum.

You know what she'd say to that, don't you?

What, Nat?

There's no such thing. You can't care too much.

Too much time has passed.

I trace Baba's face on the screen with my fingertips. I memorize his voice.

Eritrea is a country traumatized by war.

I want to feel his skin.

This once free country is a military prison.

I whisper his words.

The world's biggest prison.

I pause the recording.

I stroke the face on the screen,

wishing it was skin.

I press play and the recording restarts.

I wonder if this video is the reason

he's no longer here.

First the Italians.

I study Baba's face.

Then the British.

I watch how he uses his hands.

Then came Ethiopia . . .

I mimic his posture. Years of war...

Baba is animated.
He gestures wildly with his hands, his eyes bright, his speech slow, picking up pace as he captivates his audience.

I stare at my reflection in the mirror.
I look into my eyes.
I examine my body.
I study my breath,
desperate to see him
in them,
in me.

There are many ways to be brave, Sammy.

Most are small, simple acts of courage.

You will find yours.

Baba's courage was in his words.

Never be afraid to speak up for what is right.

It's too hard, Baba. I feel hopeless.

It's never hopeless, Sammy. Never. You know why?

Why?

Because no matter how dark it gets there are still stars in the sky.

He lived by these words. Even after Black Tuesday – the eighteenth of September 2001.

The day seven independent national newspapers were banned.

The day the Eritrean press died and a fully militarized country was born

Baba mourned this day every year.

Eritrea, our beautiful country, has descended into the abyss, Sammy. It is my job to tell people the truth.

But aren't you scared, Baba?

We have to face our fears if we are to be free, Sammy.

Mama tells me
he showed no weakness
when the soldiers came for him.
He looked them
straight in the eye
as they brought him down

I'm not brave, Baba, You were brave. Why aren't I? Why aren't I more like her, Dad?

You are, Nat. You're the spitting image of her.

She had a big heart.

Yours ain't so small.

I feel like my chest has been stamped on.

When's it gonna stop hurting?

Dad?

Dad?

You want the truth?

Always.

Dunno if it does, Nat. I dunno if it ever does.

Does the pain ever stop, Mama?

I am nothing without you both.

Nothing lives without the sun.

One day . . . it will get easier.

Baba was the sun.

And he still shines.

You are more . . .

I am dust. Nothing but dust.

Yes you are, Sammy.

Stardust.

You are the most precious gift of all.
