13 August
by V. Chandra, staff writer

On a quiet residential street near Stepney Green in East London, something extraordinary is happening. Because one of these unassuming terraced houses is home to Alex and Freddy Sharma – two primary school-age brothers who argue over all the usual brother stuff, who play video games and love ice cream and hanging out with their friends. And who also happen to be the most sophisticated robots in the country, or indeed possibly the world.

No-one's quite sure on that last point – in part because so few reporters have been given access to the boys. Their adopted mother is the world-renowned cyberneticist Doctor Rita Sharma, Chief Scientific Officer of B.A.I.D., and she guards their privacy fiercely. I've been granted a rare interview today, but when I arrive at their door I can't help but feel Dr Sharma is eyeing me suspiciously: her manner is very quiet and reserved.

Freddy is, on the other hand, less so. I enter the living room to find him charging around with a pair of bright purple underpants on his head, yelling "EAT YOUR OWN BUTTOCKS, MAN!" with what can
