She crashed the aircraft twice. But that didn't stop her.

Would you mind if I flew across the Atlantic?

Solo—as the pilot this time, not a passenger.

My life will depend on using these instruments to "fly blind" through clouds and storms.

On May 20, 1932, Amelia departed, alone, from Newfoundland, Canada, headed to Paris.

Do you think I can make it?

You bet.

Amelia Earhart led a life of daring adventures! Born in 1897, she grew up during the early years of flight and became a record-breaking pilot known around the world.

There is more to life than being a passenger!

In 1928, Amelia was a social worker helping immigrant families and flying whenever she could. She was one of the few women with a pilot's license.

Miss Earhart, you have an urgent phone call.

Would you like to make aviation history?
