Praise Poem

Let us begin
with the hottest of days and the shock of icy water sipped from frosted glass.

Let us begin
with the tickle of a ladybird and the rosebud of its freckled red coat.

Let us begin
with the fizz of sherbet lemon sizzling on the tongue.

Let us begin
with the sudden grin and giggle of a joke cracked open like a walnut.

Let us begin
with the cat's warm purr
and the first crazy petals of snow falling.

Let us begin
with the kicking of legs
as the swing flings itself higher.

Let us begin
with a blade of grass and sunlight pouring through clouds like golden dust.

Let us begin
with the hot breath of chips on a cold night and the surprise of torchlight icing the dark.

Let us begin
by counting the rings on your fingertips and the mystery of a magnet's pull.

Yes, let us begin
with such simple things.

A Poem to Be Spoken Silently . . .

It was so silent that I heard
my thoughts rustle
like leaves in a paper bag . . .

It was so peaceful that I heard the trees ease off their coats of bark . . .

It was so still that I heard the paving stones groan as they muscled for space . . .

It was so silent that I heard a page of this book
whisper to its neighbour,
'Look, he's peering at us again . . .'

It was so still that I felt a raindrop grin
as it tickled the window's pane . . .

It was so calm that I sensed a smile crack
the wary face of a stranger . . .

It was so quiet that I heard the morning earth roll over in its sleep and doze for five minutes more . . .

Wings

If I had wings

I would touch the fingertips of clouds and glide on the wind's breath.

If I had wings

I would taste a chunk of the sun,
as hot as peppered curry.

If I had wings

I would listen to the clouds of sheep bleat that graze on the blue.

If I had wings

I would breathe deep and sniff
the scent of raindrops.

If I had wings

I would gaze at people
who cling to the earth.

If I had wings

I would dream of
swimming the deserts
and walking the seas.

The Cloud Appreciation Society

Clouds are no bother;
they do not interfere
with anyone –
are not known to be busybodies,
keep their noses clean.
They loiter quietly,
then shuffle on.

Clouds are cheap;
make ideal pets.
Needing no feeding,
they thrive
with no real attention.
The main advantage
of a cloud
is that it takes
no looking after.
Clouds just get on with the job
of shepherding themselves.
You do not need a dog
to round them up.

The sun warms
a cloud's back –
the wind sculpts
its shifting form.

Dawn brings another bunch of cloud surprises – all shapes and sizes blossoming, whether you like it or not.
For the work of a cloud is never finished –
the job never done.

Perhaps it's not much fun
being a cloud . . .
but at least they have no need to be perfect.

Nameless, they shift storms.
Blameless, they ferment lightning.

No one has ever tamed a cloud.

I like the way clouds
look after themselves
without any fuss.
A bus needs a driver,
a ship needs a sail,
but a cloud moves on
like a gigantic soft whale slowly easing through a sea of blue.

New clouds pillow,
billowing and blowing.
No cloud is ever the same.
You'll never find
identical clouds.

Drift on white
mystery.
Ghost-silent,
each moment
making cloud
history.

Are You Sleepwalking?

Cats are more than alive.
That purposeful purr,
the ripple
of muscle and fur;
and bright eyes seen green
in midnight headlights . . .

But what about trees?
They too grow slow,
stretching up;
their thin limbs
covered in rough skin.
They live and die.

But is water alive?
Like us it sleeps,
still and deep –
then shifts restlessly
like wind-blown silk,
or silver pouring from a tap.
If you touch water,
it moves aside,
its wet invitation
lets you slide in.

And rocks –
may be hard as nails, but they wear a thin skin –
a cold crust of lichen;
icy in winter,
warmed by simple sun.
Like solid old men,
weathered till
they too crumble into dust.

You must look close enough, to enter their world –
even the grass seems alive – as it uncurls its slim, green skin and twists with the wind.

And what of you?
Have you yet woken to the world,
sensing its every move?
Or are you sleepwalking through every waking moment?

Watching

Watching

the red admiral's miracle, the opening and closing of wings,

the gentle fluttering of prayer flags and the peacocks clustering on the purple buddleia.

Watching their dusty colours and silks flickering.

Watching the tubby bees noisily nudging for a space, nectar-greedy.

Watching

the sunlight catching

the flowers and speared leaves,

describing shadows,

and I'm thinking

how many of the small things that I love are free for those who know

how to see for themselves the miraculous and commonplace so close to hand –

the ant's hieroglyphic trail;
the snail's slow determination;
even the money spider –
that pinprick of blood, perfect on a red-brick wall.

Go into —

a river as it noses by
burrowing between banks, carving through stone.

Within it must be lonely;
except for the constant chatter
of stones rattling along;
except for the slither
of eels and the silver of fish.

Go in —
you might find the sky
or the moon or your own face staring back.

Inside, there is the rush of waterfalls and a wave's curve;
the imprint of a whale
and the dark shadow of a shark.

Go in —
it will wash away
the day's dirt and some may be dazzled by its power to free the soul
from sin — so, dip in —
it may not be as cold
as you fear.

Spain – Summer Diary 2001

Wednesday morning

Cicadas buzz
like electricity.

It's so hot that
wasps and bees drink
from the swimming pool.

Ants carry off trophies from our meal.

Stunned by sun.
Heat bounces
off whitewashed walls.
The track ahead shimmers.

Flies irritate –
whining,
stalking the cup's rim –
settling on my hand.

Towels map the washing line –
the breeze quivers –
a distant lorry tugs uphill.

Cicadas are busy.
The hillside seems alive.

Inside the fridge hums.
The landscape does nothing too.

Clouds drift my thoughts distant hills –

like a sleeping lion –
crouch.

The sun steadily
turns up the temperature.

Pastel-blue dragonflies,
pencil-slim,
hover by the pool.

Daisy's wasp sting –
a white injection mark –
like a tiny, raised moon.

It's three o'clock at night.
Lightning bursts over mountains
in a purple fuzz.

Trying to sleep but the room is too stuffy – even the pillows sweat.

Moon crumbles night swim stars scatter
