ONE COLD MARCH MORNING, Little Grey Rabbit awoke at dawn, for this was to be a busy day.

Softly she opened her door and listened. Snores could be heard coming from Hare's room, and squeaky little grunts from Squirrel's.

She crept downstairs, took down a round wicker basket and went out into the raw air.

The sun had not yet risen, and a single star still shone in the sky, "like a candle for a little rabbit," she thought.

As she walked down the garden path she looked back at the shut windows and waved a paw to her sleeping friends in the little house.

She turned down the lane and scampered over the stones, leaping over thorny briars and swinging her basket round and round above her head.
